

Dear CodeTree Family,

Before we get to all the technicals I would like to say, I am writing this letter with great news for all the amazing people who helped CodeTree get to where it is. This family is comprised of all the amazing people that invested in this company, all the people that work to achieve the goal that I have set, and all the other wonderful people that supported me throughout this career. This letter is also a formal invitation to the first ever CodeTree IPO announcement party. We have had a great fiscal year with great returns on investments and amazing outcomes on projects that we have completed. With the amount of blood, sweat, tears, and money we have put into this company we are finally seeing the outcomes we are looking for. The projects we have made before now have all been crowdfunded or money from our own wallets. Now is the perfect time to seek help from our beloved followers, customers, and believers. This last quarter alone we invested more than 500 million dollars, we expected to make a loss, but we were surprised. We grossed upwards of 945 million dollars as a company, this means we took around 445 million dollars in profit. To all the to all the doubters in my life, take that. We were able to monetize a market no one thought had a good ROI. As a collective, our capital is now 1.2 billion dollars, we will be going public with roughly 40 million shares. Of course, the investors and I will be rewarded generously. I would also like to announce that if this trend continues, we will be able to add more shares and allow employees to earn shares as a part of their contracts. A new retirement program will be created for all, and a new pension fund will also be in place. With all this great news we must keep our head straight, make sure we still know our exact goal. This party is a celebration of a new era for this company.

Thank you all from the bottom of my heart,

Paksh Patel
